

Professional Profile

My professional work encompasses the fields of financial analysis, business development, project management, institutional coordination, journalism, education, higher education mentoring, research, and cultural leadership.

My work focuses on strategic planning, organizational development, financial and operational management, professional communication, and the implementation of complex initiatives.

I began my professional career at Europe 2000 Radio in Paris, where I worked as Deputy Director. My responsibilities included supporting strategic programming, coordinating operations, and participating in cultural and professional initiatives aimed at strengthening relations between France and Hungary.

The radio station was established with the support of Ferenc Bartha, former President of the National Bank of Hungary. Its aim was to present Hungarian cultural life to French audiences and to promote communication and cooperation between the two countries.

In this position, I contributed to the operation and development of an international media platform that connected cultural broadcasting with broader professional and institutional cooperation.

The radio station also cooperated with the Foreign Exchange Policy Department of the National Bank of Hungary, supporting Hungarian businesses operating in international markets.

Subsequently, I worked as a financial and commercial representative in Strasbourg, providing business solutions and supporting commercial activities in the French market.

My work combined financial knowledge, sales strategy, client relationship management, and the coordination of business activities across different professional environments.

The position required the ability to identify client needs, understand business objectives, and communicate financial and business information effectively.

Establishing and maintaining professional relationships was a key part of the role, as was the ability to develop solutions tailored to the needs of individual organizations.

My responsibilities incorporated both commercial representation and financial advisory perspectives, providing opportunities to apply analytical thinking to practical business situations.

My work as a financial consultant on the VAM Design Center project in Budapest focused on the financial analysis of real estate developments and cultural investments, as well as investment support. I contributed to the investment phase of the VAM Design Center, particularly by supporting financial planning, financing strategy, and the development of the budget structure.

The project aimed to develop a cultural complex in Budapest covering approximately 11,500 square meters and incorporating offices, studios, and exhibition spaces.

In addition to my financial and commercial activities, I also gained experience in the fields of financial journalism and professional publications.

As Director of Hitelezés-Kockázatkezelés Újság, I was responsible for developing editorial strategy, expanding expert content, and maintaining cooperation with professional stakeholders in the Hungarian financial and risk management sectors.

The publication addressed issues relating to lending practices, financial decision-making, risk analysis, and risk management systems. Its content presented the conditions and requirements associated with lending, the operation of monitoring and evaluation processes, and the challenges arising in financial practice.

The editorial work combined specialized expertise with professional communication, with the aim of presenting complex financial topics in a structured and accessible manner for the relevant professional audiences.

The publishing activities also included educational services. The organization operated as an adult education institution, providing, among other things, training in knowledge and information management, European Union grant-writing methodology, practical grant-writing, and Basel II.

The publication's cooperation with the Hungarian National Digital Data Archive also reflected its role in professional information management.

My project management experience at Budapest Metropolitan University was related to supporting the implementation of institutional projects. As a contractual project manager, I participated in coordination, documentation, and communication tasks, with particular emphasis on cooperation between organizational units.

The role required a systematic administrative approach and the ability to maintain communication among different institutional stakeholders.

During my teaching work at Madách Imre Boarding School, I taught and supported students in a boarding school environment.

My responsibilities included personalized instruction, academic support, and mentoring, with particular attention to students' development and the acquisition of the necessary knowledge and skills.

One important area of my work was education aimed at developing financial literacy.

The objective was to help young people acquire a more solid understanding of financial and economic concepts while improving their ability to interpret financial information. Financial literacy involves more than simply knowing technical terminology; it also includes evaluating information, recognizing potential risks, and understanding the consequences of financial decisions.

For this reason, my teaching focused on developing knowledge and a practical perspective that would support more considered financial decision-making. I helped students understand financial products and concepts, recognize the importance of gathering information before making decisions, and understand the relationships between their own choices and their future financial circumstances.

My teaching experience therefore combined the transfer of subject-specific knowledge with mentoring and personalized academic support. It also provided opportunities to apply my financial professional background in an educational environment and to translate specialized expertise into learning objectives tailored to students' needs.

My mentoring activities as a thesis supervisor for students at Budapest Business University further strengthened the connection between professional knowledge and education. I supported college and university students in the areas of research methodology, academic writing, and strategic thinking.

This work required attention to research structure, the development of academic arguments, and the systematic preparation of written projects.

My current cultural and organizational activities combine project management, international cooperation, art research, and strategic leadership.

As President of the NVO987 – Culture Visuelle Moderne et Contemporaine association, I am responsible for the organization's strategic management, the development of its cultural initiatives, and the promotion of modern and contemporary visual culture.

The organization's activities explore the intersections of visual culture, art history, and contemporary artistic practice.

Its work extends to international cooperation, art research, and the development of cultural projects. In addition to knowledge of the cultural sector, these activities require leadership and organizational skills necessary for defining organizational objectives, coordinating initiatives, and maintaining professional relationships.

Taken together, my professional experience demonstrates work across financial analysis, investment support, commercial representation, publishing, education, academic mentoring, project management, and cultural leadership. These fields are connected by structured thinking, professional communication, coordination, and the application of specialized knowledge to practical objectives.

This interdisciplinary background enables me to approach professional challenges from financial, organizational, educational, and cultural perspectives. I combine analytical work with communication and project coordination experience, while consistently keeping in mind the relationship between strategic objectives and their practical implementation.

My professional profile is therefore defined not by an affiliation with a single sector, but by the integration of several complementary areas of expertise.

Throughout my activities, I have worked with companies, institutions, educational organizations, professional publications, and cultural initiatives, contributing to projects that require both subject-specific knowledge and the ability to coordinate people, information, and organizational processes.
